Liverpool, Oct. 26, 1867.

My dear Friend:

I am going this morning to embark for the United States, but, though severely pressed for time, having many "last things" to attend to, I cannot leave without acknowledging the receipt of your kind and affectionate letter of the 18th instant, and returning you my warmest thanks for the same. My visit to Huntly Lodge in special, and Edinburgh in totality, will be among the most gratifying reminiscences of my visit to Europe. I will not give up the hope of seeing you in Boston next summer, and trust you will find both health and courage to cross the Atlantic at that time. Possibly, I may be permitted again to come over to England, and again to visit Edinburgh; in that case trusting to see you once more in the flesh.

Fanny is in Paris with her husband, where they expect to reside during the coming winter. Letters will reach her, if addressed to the "care of Bowles, Drevet & Co., 24 Rue de la Paix, Paris," should you feel any inclination to write to her at any time. She will be delighted to hear from you, and to reciprocate the favor.

Frank will return home with me. So will Anne Warren Weston, and also Mrs. Miller, the daughter of Gerrit Smith.

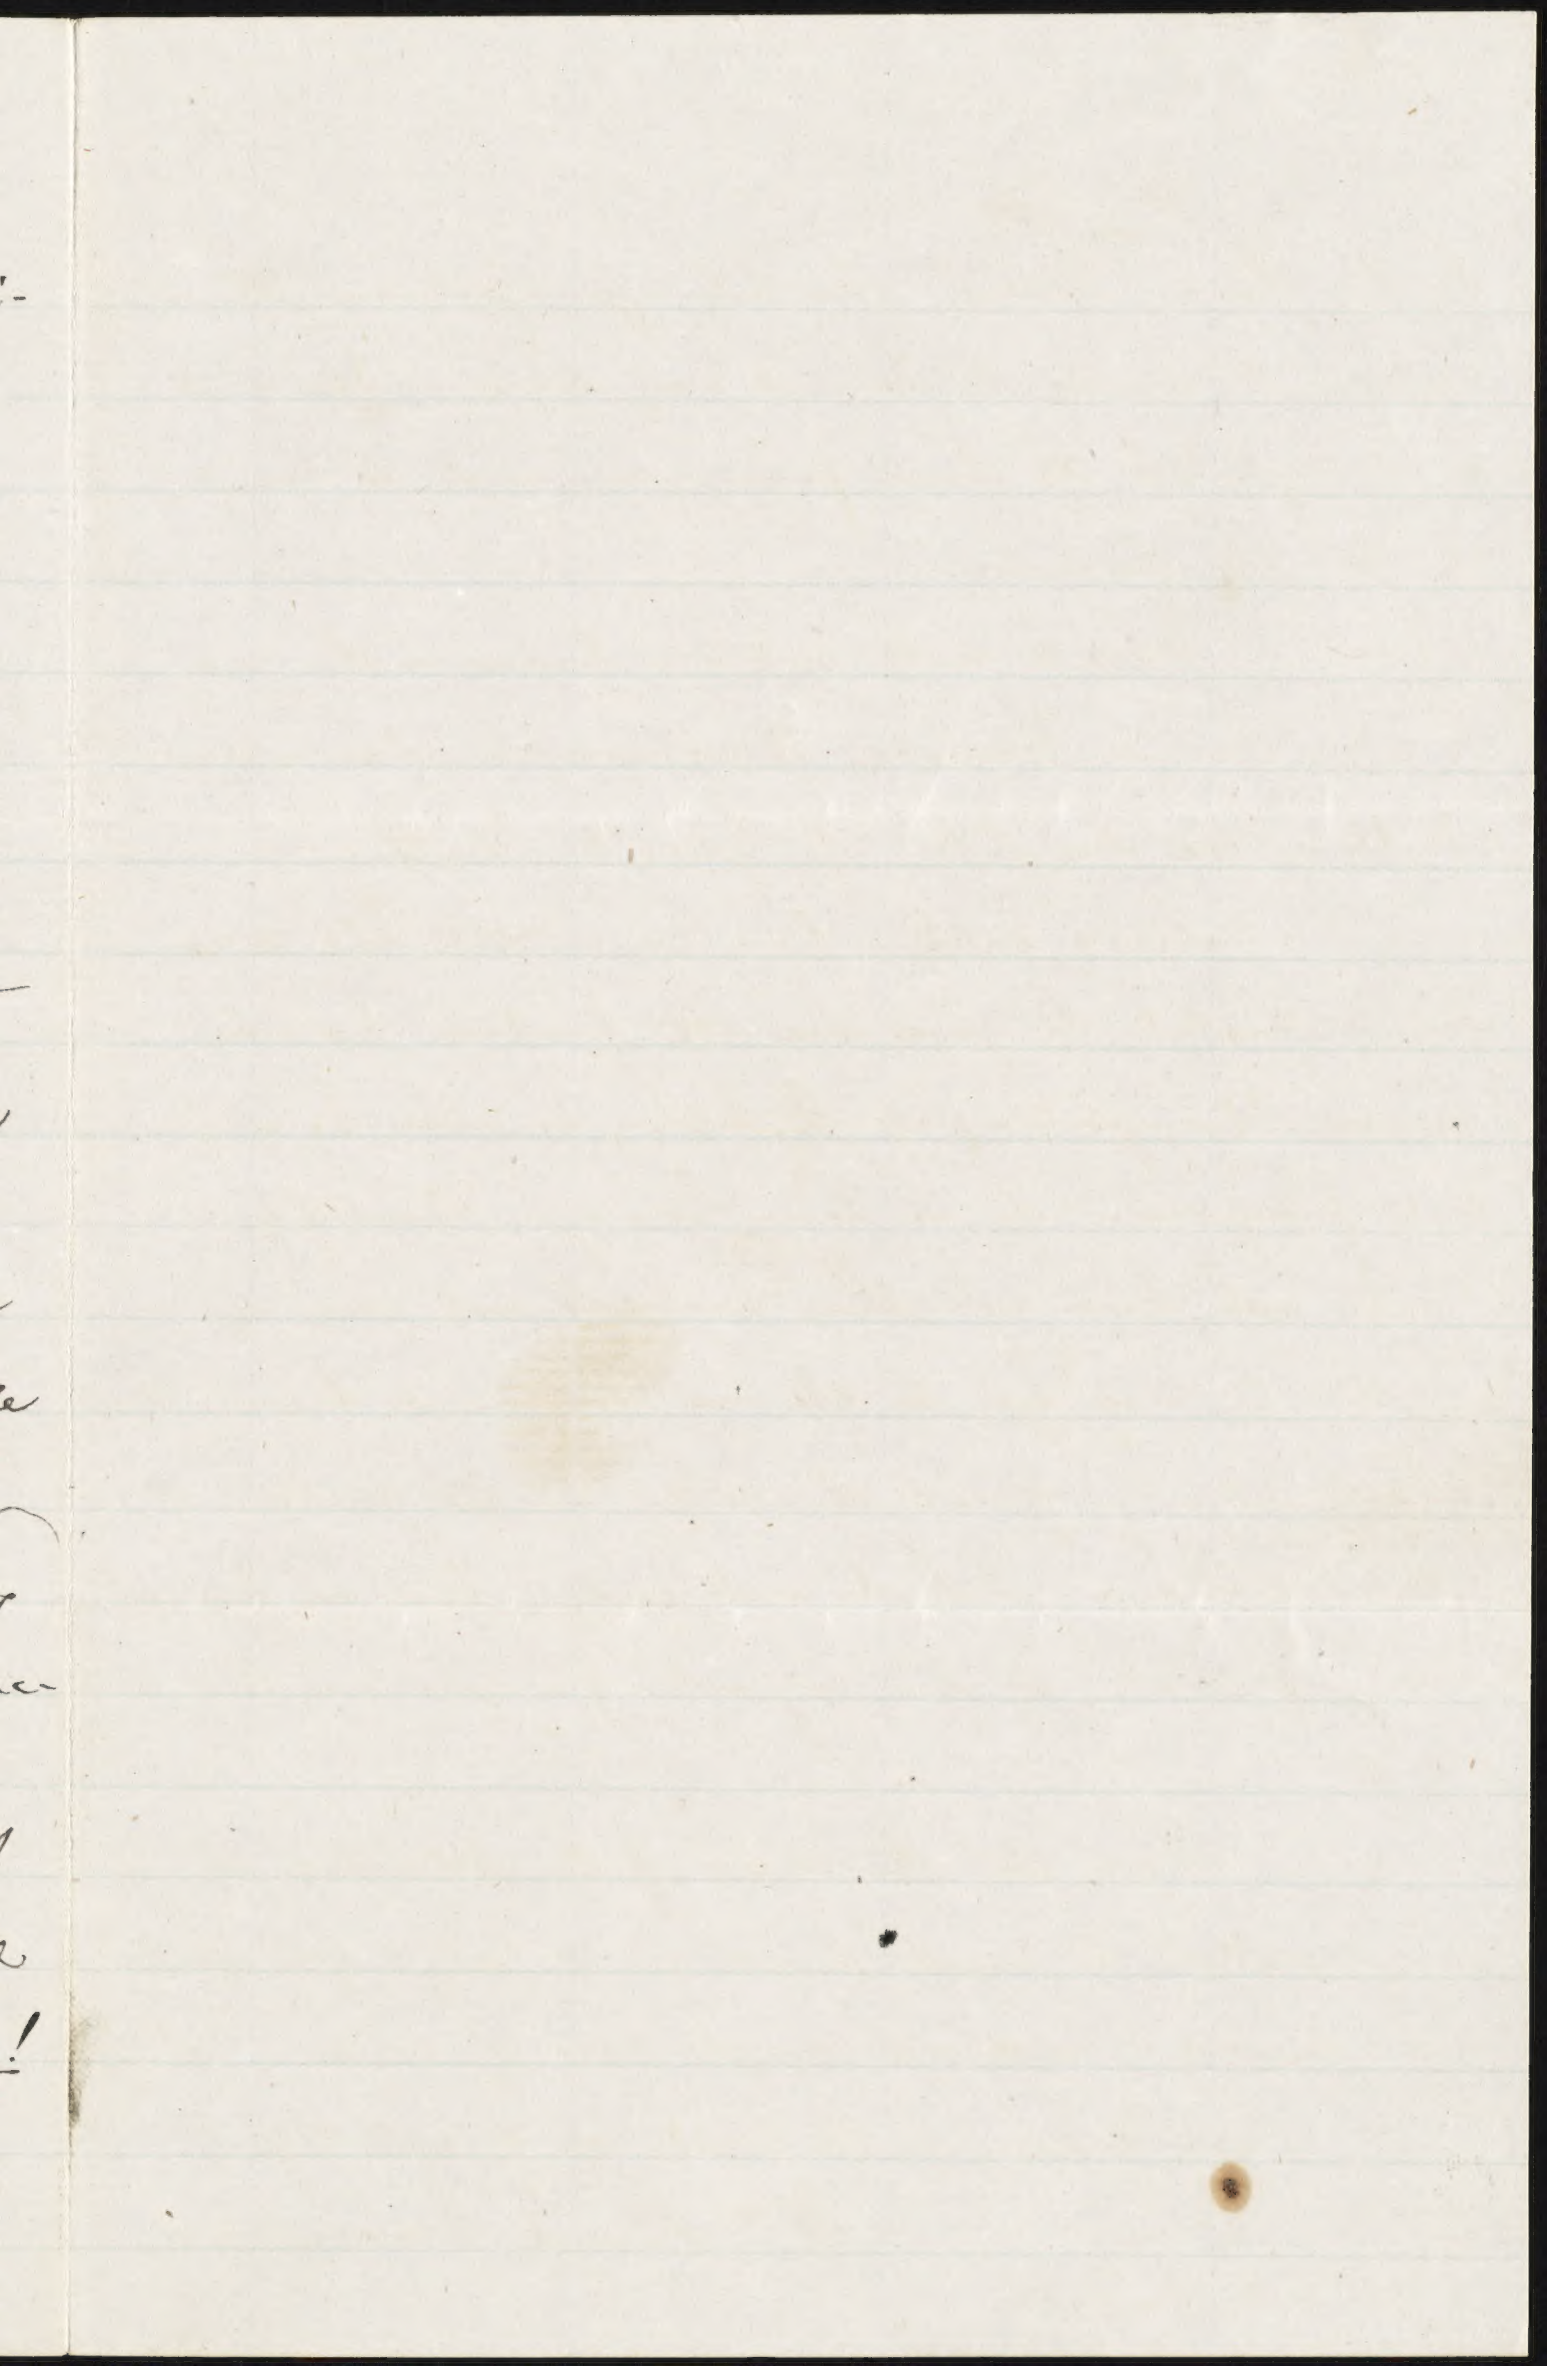

Miss Estlin has come all the way from Bristol to give me the parting hand. James Haughton, of Dublin, is also here for that purpose. So is dear George Thompson. I will ask him whether he does not owe you a letter in response to the one you sent him. He is singularly procrastinating in the matter of letter-writing. But do not judge him as having lost <sup>even</sup> a particle of his regard for you on this account.

From the other side of the Atlantic, if I am permitted to reach home in safety, you shall hear from me without much loss of time. Vale!

Yours, in the bonds of friendship,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

Mrs. E. P. Nichols.
